As with all aspects of a gluten-free diet, experience makes food shopping easier. Many foods are naturally gluten-free and can be purchased as in local supermarkets. But if not, you can still take heart because more and more grocery stores allocate space to gluten-free products. (If the supermarket doesn't, tell the manager and let your friends tell them, in general, health food stores can represent a good source of gluten-free products; here's the name of some supermarkets that make lists of gluten-free products available on their websites; but don't forget: local stores aren't the only option; mail-order websites listed below recommend ordering products by mail if the stores listed below aren't convenient; mail-order websites listed below represent only a small sample of the dozens of companies that will send gluten-free products directly to the door. Hoxton / Tom Merton / Getty Images Hannaford: You can see a list of foods in local stores that are considered gluten-free on the Hannaford website. Hannaford is located in the northeastern United States. Kroger Company: You might be surprised to know that individual grocery chains across the U.S. are actually owned by the Kroger Company. All of them can pull up a long list of gluten-free products sold in stores if they search for gluten-free. Nevertheless, if you are shopping at Harris Teeter, you will find a variety of products that are usually clearly labeled gluten free. Publix: Publix doesn't maintain an online list of gluten-free products, but its stores offer a variety of safe options. The grocery store chain mixes gluten-free and gluten-containing foods with gluten-containing items (rather than placing them in their own special sections), so always check back to make sure you pick up the right product. ShopRite: Shoprite's list of gluten-free items is available online. Stop and shop: Stop and shop the supermarket's list of gluten-free products can be found on the website. Trader Joe's: Trader Joe's provides a downloadable product list of their gluten-free items. Wegmans: Wegmans stores an online list that includes gluten-free selections, but you can find more options in stores. Expect an entire aisle filled with gluten-free packaging specialties and fresh gluten-free ingredients and frozen items. in each section. Finally, all the sushi made in the Wegmans store is gluten-free, with gluten-free soy sauce and even a dipping sauce. Whole Foods Market: The Whole Foods website provides a store-by-store list of gluten-free items. Sainsbury's (UK): Sainsbury's has a long history of following gluten-free diets. The supermarket chain stores a list of gluten-free items on its website. In addition to a list of gluten-free products, Sainsbury's also publishes gluten-free recipes (enter gluten as a searcher on its recipe page). Delhaize (Belgium): Delhaize Company (which owns Food Lion and Hannaford in the U.S.) has a range of specialty foods for gluten-free people. These foods are displayed in a separate section of the store. www.GlutenFree.co.il (Israel): Kosher gluten-free products are the largest stores in Israel. They are also shipped worldwide. Ready-made gluten-free foods can be stored in the freezer and preheated when you need something that's easy and quick to prepare. You can use a lot of gluten-free products that are ready to eat at the grocery store, but if you need to order them by mail, dietary specialties: Dietary specialties offer gluten-free spaghetti, pie crusts, pizzas and other products. Everyone Eats, Inc.: Everyone Eats is a New York City-based restaurant specializing in gluten-free cuisine. They are offered by ships with five boroughs across the country via the Federal Express. Gluten-free entrees, breads, pastas, desserts and 100% gluten-free bakeries offer freshly made sweets. Some lists of products are displayed on the website. Here are some of the many companies that can order gluten-free products by mail: Amazon: Amazon - which has sold a lot of packaged foods in recent years - has a surprisingly good selection of gluten-free products. They are not grouped in one place. Instead, if you want gluten-free nut butter, you should search for gluten-free nut butter. Not everything on the upcoming list is considered gluten-free - due diligence should be done by calculating through ingredient lists and allergy statements for each individual product. Also, some products may not appear in the search, but they may still be gluten-free. You should read the manufacturer's description. However, given these caveats, Amazon can be a convenient place to buy gluten-free products. Gluten Free Mall: Offers a wide range of gluten-free, wheat-free, casein-free and other allergy-related health foods and special dietary foods, some of which you won't find anywhere else. Kinnikinnick Foods Inc.: Kinnikinnick Foods manufactures gluten-free, car-free foods in its own dedicated gluten-free facility and offers a wide range of gluten-free products focused on bread products, muffins, breads and rolls, breakfast items (including frozen waffles) and doughnuts. Amazon Amazon's UK web-based stores offer as many gluten-free products as they do in the US. GoodnessDirect (USA): GoodnessDirect sells food and other health products for customers in the UK who need a special diet. Their products include gluten-free baby food. Shopping for gluten-free food is easier than it was a few years ago, but it can still be a frustrating experience. Nevertheless, gluten-free listings and gluten-free labelling from large supermarket chains and online retailers can make this frustrating process much easier. However, while shopping, it's important to keep in mind that stores and websites are sometimes inconsistent with labeling products that are gluten-free. When buying, you should still check carefully to make sure that you have chosen, in fact, the safety you can eat. Thanks for your comments! What are your interests?
